

An albino on a bike

Bike in the castle

Castle full of dogs

Dogs in the evening

An evening of fire.

Fire in the garden..

Garden of the house.

House of icons.

Icons of justice.

Justice of knights.

Knights of love.

Love of the moning.

Morning of numbers.

Number of objects.

Objects in piles.

Quixotic.

Where do the fabled knights-errant exist in today's world? Every individual should have a quixotic experience: taking on the status quo, disregarding conventional wisdom and personal consequences, and courageously seeking an impossible dream in the face of criticism.

When spoken, "quixotic" is usually accompanied with a slight grin and an awe-inspired shake of the head.

(Note: I prefer the etymological mis-pronunciation "kee-hoe-tic.")

Tyler Collins

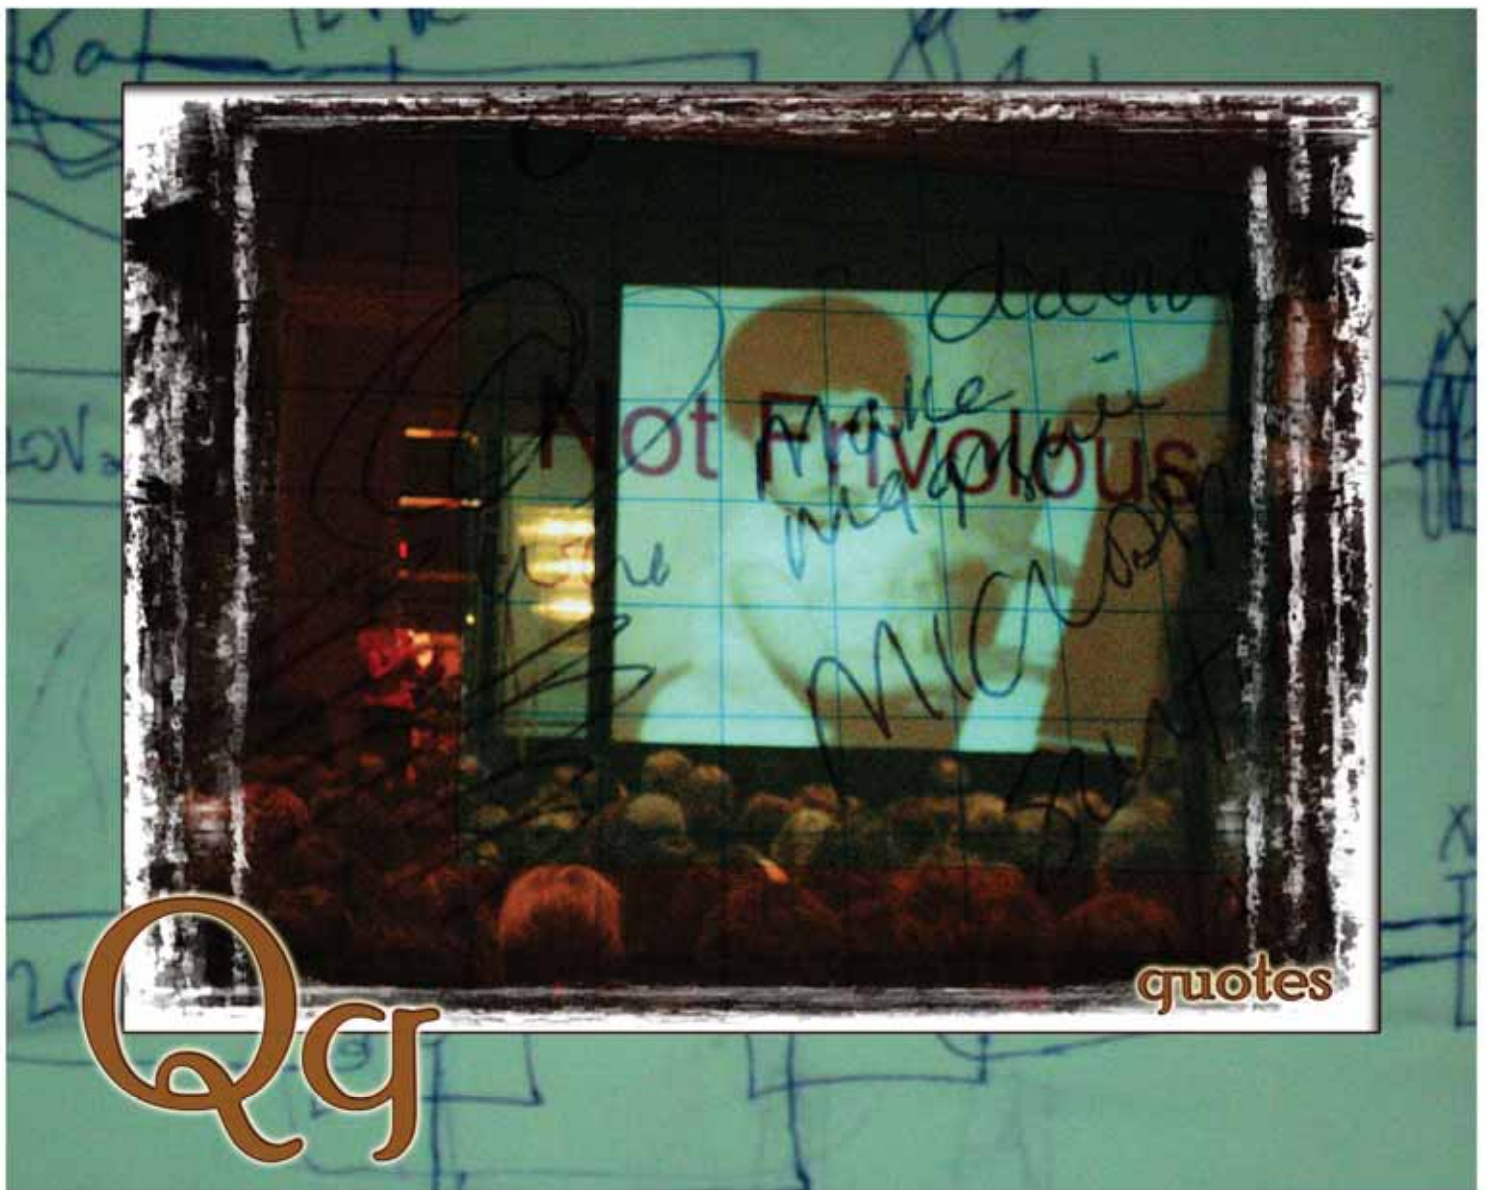

Quotidian.

My favorite word (at least for today) is quotidian. I like it because I just recently discovered it (which, considering I've been seeking and discovering words for more than 40 years, is quite remarkable), and because even though it has a very logical Latin base, discovering its meaning by educated guess is not easy (at least, it wasn't for me). I also like it because it is a useful word and because its meaning is precisely the opposite of what it is (common, ordinary, everyday). Great word, quotidian.

David Gunn

piles

Piles of quotes.

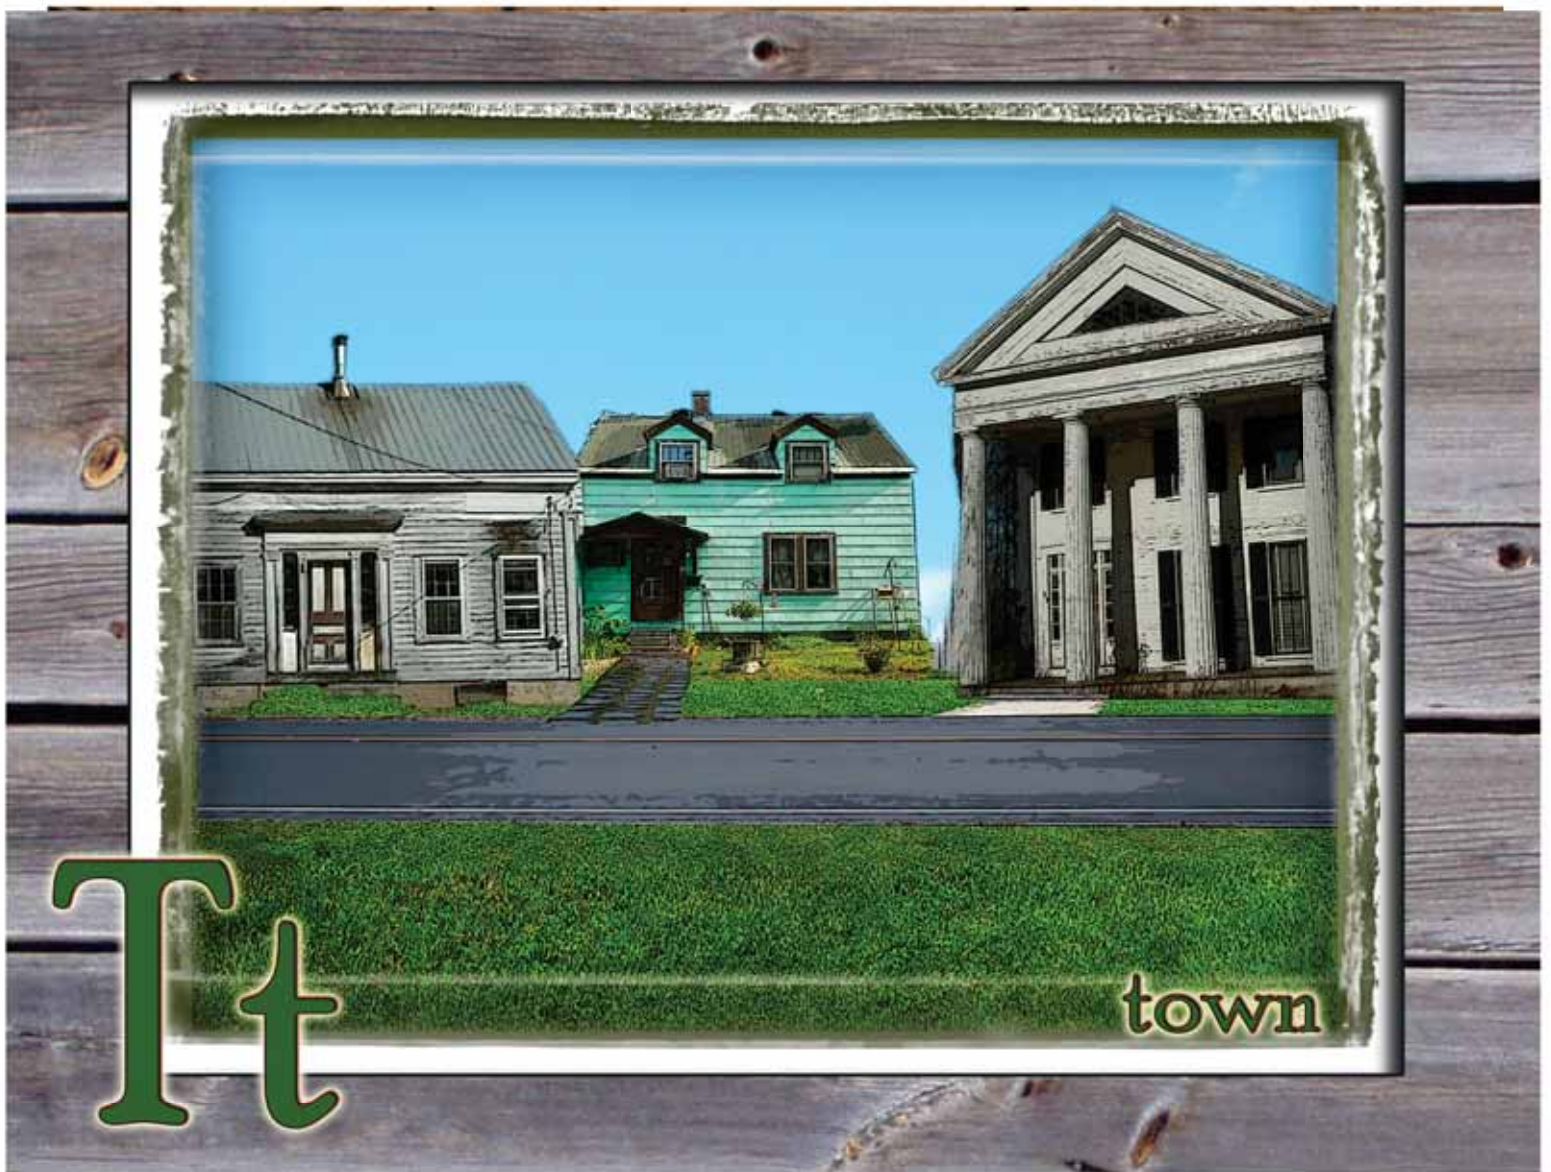

Quotes of Randomness.

Random piece of sky.

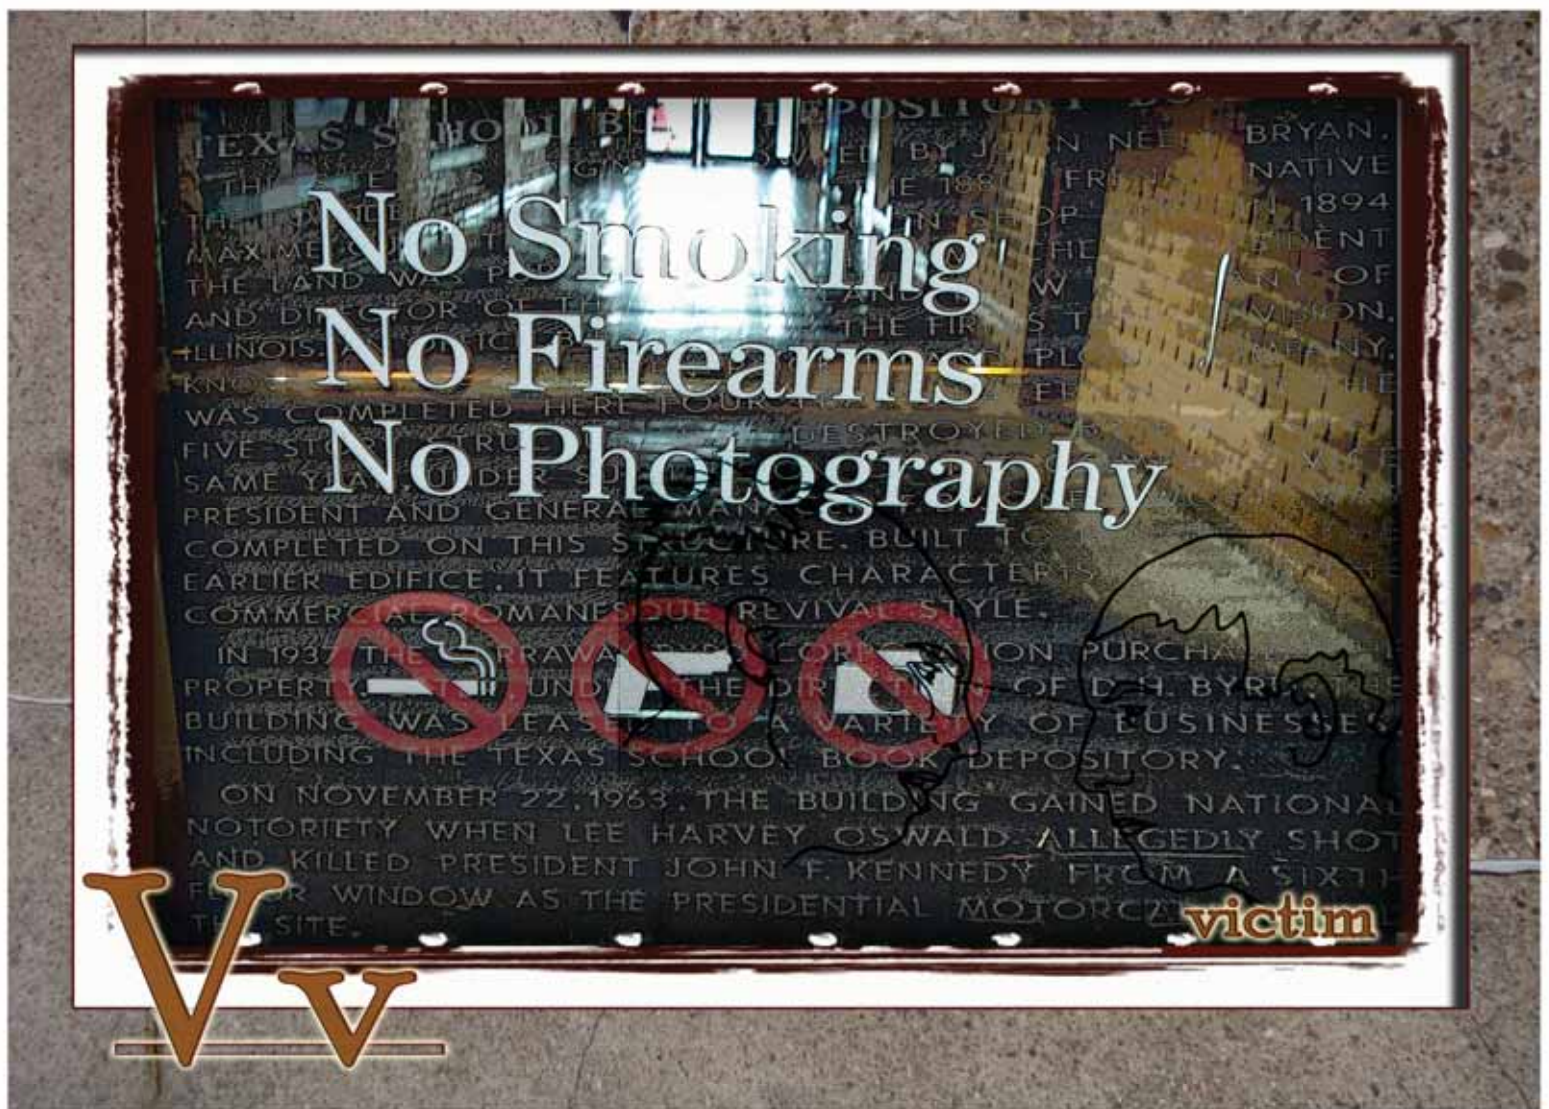

Sky of the town,

Town uphill.

Uphill (Grassy Knole)
victim.

Victim in the west.

Western xrays.

Xrays of youth.

Youth in zebra cloth.

Zebra ridden by an albino.